The Chinese House Church Movement (1980s-present) is a movement of Christians in China who have chosen to worship in small, informal gatherings in private homes rather than in the state-sanctioned churches. This movement has been growing since the 1980s and has become a major force in Chinese Christianity.

The Chinese House Church Movement began in the 1980s as a response to the restrictions placed on religious practice by the Chinese government. The government had imposed strict regulations on religious activities, including the size of churches, the number of people allowed to attend services, and the content of sermons. In response, many Christians chose to meet in small, informal gatherings in private homes.

These house churches were often led by laypeople, rather than ordained clergy, and were often more informal and less structured than traditional churches. They also tended to be more open to different interpretations of scripture and more willing to discuss controversial topics.

The Chinese House Church Movement has grown steadily since the 1980s, and today there are estimated to be over 100 million Christians in China who are part of the movement. The movement has also spread to other countries, including the United States, where there are now several large Chinese house churches.

The Chinese House Church Movement has been a source of strength and inspiration for many Chinese Christians. It has provided a safe space for believers to come together and worship without fear of persecution or government interference. It has also allowed Christians to explore different interpretations of scripture and to discuss controversial topics in a safe and supportive environment.

The Chinese House Church Movement has also been a source of controversy. Some critics have argued that the movement is too informal and lacks the structure and discipline of traditional churches. Others have argued that the movement is too open to different interpretations of scripture and that it is not in line with traditional Christian teachings.

Despite these criticisms, the Chinese House Church Movement has been a powerful force in Chinese Christianity and has helped to spread the gospel to millions of people. It has also provided a safe space for believers to come together and worship without fear of persecution or government interference.
